I am an avid XM listener. I also listen to terrestrial radio when and if they have programming that I would rather listen to. I find that certain terrestrial radio programs are superior to XM's programming. With that being said, let's get back to the root of capitalism - survival of the best. If XM wants to put out a product that is better than the terrestrial broadcasters they should have that right. I will listen to the most attractive product. As a citizen, I should have that right.

As a democratic government, that right should be granted. It would be a violation of my capitalistic freedom for the government to choose to block a potentially superior product over an existing product in the name of protection of the products.

A good capitalist is dynamic and changing with the times. I leave you with this thought - where would we be today if the government would have prevented the computer industry from evolving in the name of protecting the "sliderule" industry...
